The Spring and Autumn Period lasted for over 300 years. By the 5th century BC, there were seven main rulers in China. Each of these states had conquered smaller areas, and they continued to fight one another. Historians refer to this period as the Warring States Period. Finally, in the early fifth century BC, Ying Zheng unified the seven states and became Emperor of China. His advancements changed the world. Before the Chinese civilization reached the West, the region was populated by earlier forms of human beings. The earliest known humans lived in China around 1 million years ago. These early people were called Homo erectus. The first ones arrived in the region from Africa around 65,000 years ago. They hunted wild animals and picked plants. They learned to farm and eventually developed civilizations, which led to the invention of the wheel, paper, and the internet.
